

Organic Radish Information Pack

Introduction

This is a crop we are really excited about for this year. It is grown on Foskett's Farm in Suffolk, a commercial scale organic grower that is trailblazing in the organic farming world. James Foskett is the second generation of the family to farm here and moved much of the land into organic production when he took over. They have nailed the tricky business of managing pest pressure and soil fertility without synthetic chemicals at scale and now produce crops of an incredibly high quality and consistency including carrots, cavolo, sweetcorn and beetroot. Jess, James' daughter, is continuing the fantastic work of her father and is now exploring regenerative certification.

Farm Information

Foskett's grow both breakfast and round red radishes as part of a larger, diverse crop rotation. Crop rotations are employed on organic farms to maintain soil fertility. Each different plant type extracts a slightly different selection of nutrients from the soil, so if you continuously plant the same crop in the same field you will find yourself deficient in those nutrients, so you must switch it up with a crop rotation. Similarly, pests tend to be plant specific, so breaking the cycle with a totally different kind of plant will keep the pests 'on their toes' as it were.

Cover crops are also planted over winter to ensure living roots are in the ground all year around, thus supporting soil life and preventing soil erosion (this is one of the key principles of Regenerative farming fyi). Furthermore, they have a strong policy that all crop residue is left in the ground post-harvest. This is important to maintain some kind of habitat for the animals that have grow accustomed to living in the crop, especially ground nesting birds and small mammals.

Due to the wide range of crops grown on this farm, Foskett's presents an exciting opportunity to support one farm across multiple product lines and build a strong relationship with the grower. This would be a great farm for the team to visit!
